The easiest way to manage your iptables configs on RHEL is to simply ignore the system provided config scripts entirely. I manage all of my RHEL systems with puppet, and use a fragments based approach as per Module Iptables Patterns.. This may not work for you if you're not a puppet shop, but at it's base all this does is build out the file /etc/sysconfig/iptables directly.

iptables can use extended packet matching modules. These are loaded in two ways: implicitly, when -p or --protocol is specified, or with the -m or --match options, followed by the matching module name; after these, various extra command line options become available, depending on the specific module.
